Elaine Navas' Painting Palettes / Palette Paintings II bares the liminal phases of a painter's process --- unconscious pauses during the work's production phase prior to its release to the public. With palettes as evidence of this threshold, these artefactual objects from friends are unwitting witnesses to each individual's triumph, frustration, compulsion, and quotidian routines that are usually kept in secret in their intimate studio spaces. These palettes are abstracted visual chronicles to creative undertaking, with every stroke and erasure, every mixture and segregation of pigment archived on these surfaces – unique and specific for every piece created. The form, material and shape it takes also speak fondly and intuitively of the artist that utilizes it.

One becomes privy to the juxtaposition of the palettes with Navas' paintings in the exhibition. Although indirectly, as the palettes are set at differing corners, the works speak constantly to the paintings --- similar to an ongoing dialogue that the artist herself would have with colleagues and friends from whom the objects belong to. Much like an archeological endeavor, each piece tries to create faithful representations in order to reveal the personas and idiosyncrasies hidden beneath the hardened pigments on the surface. Distinct color schemes, strokes and idiosyncratic practices of the artists who have used the palettes, as well as the undeniable connection between the maker and the materials that surrounds him/her in producing a work come to fore. Levels of transference are applied --- from framing the objects themselves to turning them into dedicated portraits formed through her recognizable impasto technique.

This interest in these "unsung heroes" sparked from a talk with the artist's professor, mentor and confidant, the late Roberto Chabet. He told Navas of a dream where he envisioned her creating paintings of palettes. Then began the artist's process of collecting from colleagues whose works had appealed to her, which was then sorted out, imitated and exhibited. This also brought up conversations, as an object that is often unmentioned and undeclared is now seen. The term "unsung heroes" came from an exchange between Navas and fellow painter Robert Langenegger. It acknowledges the value of an overlooked object despite its being crucial to the production of the works that one puts out in the public.

Palettes are rarely alluded to, as they are mundane things that are merely used and later on cleaned for the next series. Even the act of cleaning and rendering it anew with every work utters the transience of the markings and traces set on its surface, never again repeated no matter the similarity in range of hues or type of paint utilized. Each palette remains unmatched with every cleanse, however at the same time always leaving hints from its possessor --- making it as individual as the painter himself/herself.

In viewing a painting about using paint, through the lens of the palette, the separations that usually persist disappear as process turns into output, the object into subject, and the personal into public. This blurring made visible through Navas' own interpretation manifests it a life of its own, yet at the same time reinforcing the connections that it had from its creator. To exhibit the palette, that is ultimately at the core of the creative processes that yield one's paintings, is to commemorate the practice of painting itself, the person behind the canvas, and the freedoms and tensions that come with producing pieces. It is to prompt notice to and honor the unseen practices and invisible labors that bring out the art works that one is left to admire and appreciate.

ABOUT SILVERLENS

Through its artist representation, institutional collaborations, art consultancy, and exhibition programming including art fairs and gallery partnerships, SILVERLENS aims to place its artists within the broader framework of the contemporary art dialogue. Its continuing efforts to transcend borders across art communities in Asia have earned it recognition from both artists and collectors as one of the leading contemporary art galleries in Southeast Asia. SILVERLENS was founded by Isa Lorenzo and Rachel Rillo in 2004.
